

Latest Market Commentary

2020 began encouragingly for investors with many financial markets performing well, driven by expectations for moderate but sustained economic growth. Some equity markets performed particularly well with the US stock markets making new all-time highs in February. In March, however, the growing fears surrounding the Coronavirus (COVID-19) led to the fastest 20% falls in history for equity markets and, as a result, global equity markets entered 'bear' market territory.

With many countries imposing a harsh lockdown, due to strict measures to contain the Coronavirus, it is inevitable that economic activity will be sorely dented. Most economists are now forecasting a severe drop in economic activity due to this unprecedented shock to the global economy. Recent jobless claims data from many countries are indicating a sharp rise in unemployment rates.

In order to shield their economies from the worst-ever potential recession, many central banks have drastically cut interest rates (to zero in most cases) and governments have instigated huge rescue packages for industries and consumers. The stimulus from authorities is on a scale akin to a war footing and is designed to prevent a recession turning into a depression.

It is very understandable that many companies are currently not able to give forward guidance for earnings in this present environment. Companies are taking action, and where necessary they are responsibly stopping dividend payments, thereby supporting their balance sheets.

The sharp drop in the price of oil (circa 55% below prices of a year ago) will bring some benefits both to industries, especially to those heavily reliant on energy, and to consumers.

We believe that there have been some signs of capitulation with, in our opinion, some assets being indiscriminately sold. The VIX (volatility index, colloquially known as the 'fear index', hit an all-time high in March; and this was considerably higher than the levels seen at the peak of the Global Financial Crisis in 2008.

More recently it is potentially encouraging to see areas of economic activity within China returning to more normal levels, as well as the latest data indicating that infection rates in South Korea (and now possibly Italy) are levelling out. As we write this commentary, it is of course not possible to predict when the lockdown measures will be lifted, though it is encouraging to see some very recent easing in parts of continental Europe. There is, however, a real risk of future 'cluster' outbreaks that could lead to further lockdown measures being required.

The very best news will, of course, be a cure, medical treatment, and/or vaccine, but more scientific research is still required before this particular coronavirus can be properly understood. We do, however, believe that this will pass, though we anticipate continued financial market volatility in the near term, particularly as predicted peak infection rates have not yet been reached for many countries.

Since the end of March there has been some encouraging improvement to global markets and ultimately, as history has shown us before, we do expect asset values to further improve and for prices to move based more clearly on fundamentals and reason.

14/04/2020

Opinions constitute our judgement as at the date of publication and are subject to change without warning. The value of investments and the income from them can go down as well as up and you may not recover the amount of your original investment. Past performance is not a reliable indicator of future results and forecasts are not a reliable indicator of future performance. Where an investment involves exposure to foreign currency, changes in the rates of exchange may cause the value of the investment and the income from it to go up or down. In the case of some investments, you should be aware that there is no recognised market for them, and that it may, therefore, be difficult for you to deal in them or for you to obtain reliable information about the value or the extent of the risks to which they are exposed. Certain investments carry a higher degree of risk than others and are, therefore, unsuitable for some investors. It may be possible to lose all of your initial capital in certain types of investments. Before contemplating any transaction you should consider whether you require financial advice. Nothing in this document should be construed a solicitation, offer or recommendation to buy or sell securities or any other investment or banking product, nor to provide any investment advice or service. Nothing contained in this document constitutes investment, legal, tax or other advice, nor should it be relied upon when making an investment or other decision. The information in this document is believed to be correct but LAM cannot guarantee its accuracy, timeliness or completeness of any such information.